

Drug Policy Modelling Program

Colonial Foundation Trust Grant

Final Report August 2013

Our context

Drugs and drug policy:

- Affects almost everyone in Australia either directly or indirectly, and much burden is experienced by young people
- Highly emotional and ideological (eg: politics and media play central roles)
- Requires multiple responses, across multiple areas of government (health, policing, education and social welfare bureaucracies and ministries) and society
- Represents a substantial economic burden to Australia (at least $8billion per annum¹)
- Undertaken without rigorous evidence upon which to base policies (requires decision-making in the face of uncertainty)
- Often fails to use evidence where it does exist
- Dependent on more than the provision of evidence alone (“necessary but insufficient”), requiring understanding of policy processes.

The DPMP exists to enable Australia to respond with alacrity and success to the challenges of drugs.

Our goals

The Drug Policy Modelling Program (DPMP) has six goals². These are to:

1. Build systems and approaches to enhance evidence-informed drug policy
2. Develop and adapt new tools and methods for policy-makers
3. Show the value of these tools by dealing with specific problems raised by policy-makers
4. Conduct rigorous research that provides independent, balanced, non-partisan analysis and improves the quality of the evidence
5. Evaluate the effectiveness of tools, methods, policy support and new interventions
6. Develop a sustained capacity for drug policy research in Australia.

DPMP has successfully achieved each of these goals. We have built and sustained a core team of drug policy scholars in Australia (see DPMP team list) that spans major Australian research institutions³. We have collaborations with people, institutions and programs across Australia and internationally. We have successfully leveraged the CFT funds to generate specific drug policy research income, and people support funds⁴. In total, we have doubled the original CFT investment - we received $7,662,000 from CFT and have generated $10,575,098 in drug policy research and people support funds. In addition to drug policy research funds, DPMP has also facilitated and enabled successful collaborations across areas broader than drug policy⁵.

² These goals were specified in the original funding application to CFT in 2005.

³ University of NSW, Burnet Institute, University of Melbourne, Curtin University, Griffith University, University of Queensland, Australian National University.

⁴ Two of the DPMP Chief Investigators are recipients of prestigious National Health and Medical Research Council (NHMRC) fellowships.

⁵ For example the successful Australian Research Council Centre for Excellence in Policing and Security ($14,430,000) which involved three DPMP Chief Investigators and which has co-funded DPMP research. These leveraged funds amount to an additional $21,997,276 since 2006.

DPMP has become an international benchmark for drug policy research⁶. We have completed more than 90 research projects – some of which have been independent research projects; others have been projects in partnership with government to provide evidence to assist their decision-making; or in partnership with communities. We have developed novel methods for drug policy analysis, and applied cutting edge methods drawn from other disciplines. Systems and approaches built by DPMP have been adopted by and have informed others in the field⁷.

Throughout the program, we have sought to inform and influence Australian decision-makers through the dissemination of our research findings in both academic and policy circles, presentations to government, submissions to government inquiries, private briefings to ministers and their staff, and consultancy research.

DPMP has generated new research which has influenced Australian drug policy.⁸ This has included work, summarised below, to inform better treatment services, better drug law enforcement, changing laws to reduce harms to drug users, improving alcohol regulation and engaging a wider range of stakeholders (such as young people or people who consume drugs) in drug policy processes.

⁶ For example, DPMP is noted in the 2009 published review of the Irish Drug Strategy as an international benchmark (http://www.drugsandalcohol.ie/11465/1/Overview_8.pdf).

⁷ One example of this is our successful drug policy roundtables which brought together opinion leaders, decision-makers and experts together on particular policy problems. The Australian National Council on Drugs (the Prime Minister’s Advisory body) has now taken up this method and conducted two of their own roundtables to date.

⁸ Change in policy or practice as a result of research arguably takes an average of 17 years (and only 14% of research is taken up. Westfall, Mold & Fagnan, 2007 JAMA. Some of the DPMP work has focussed on how to change this.

Areas of activity

DPMP spans illegal drugs (such as cannabis, heroin and methamphetamine) and since 2011 we have included alcohol. We conduct research, engage with policy dialogues, and provide resources to assist decision-makers. The following areas provide an indication of the breadth and depth of DPMP work:

1. Creating better alcohol policy
2. Challenging existing drug laws for use/possess
3. Understanding Australian drug policy
4. Improving drug law enforcement effectiveness
5. Understanding changing trends in drug use and supply in Australia
6. Providing better drug treatment in Australia
7. Enhancing translation from research into policy
8. Studying policy processes: politics, media and public opinion

1. Creating better alcohol policy

Challenges for better alcohol policy in Australia include regulatory reform, such as alcohol taxation and minimum pricing, along with reviews of liquor licensing. DPMP work has included:

- Review of the evidence in relation to minimum pricing of alcohol
- How do alcohol and illicit drug prices affect young Australians' plans for Saturday night?
- Regulating drinkers: functions and effects of street liquor bans
- Regulatory compliance in alcohol sales: exploring the policy context of liquor licensing enforcement in Victoria
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Submission to the Australian National Preventative Health Agency: Chalmers, J., Carragher, N., Davoren, S., & O'Brien P. (2012, November). Real or Perceived Impediments to Minimum Pricing of Alcohol in Australia: Public Opinion, the Industry and the Law.

2. Challenging existing drug laws for use/possess

There is growing international consensus that the "war on drugs" has failed. Criminal penalties associated with drug use (as opposed to drug trafficking) are arguably misplaced and individuals who use drugs should receive an appropriate health rather than criminal justice response. DPMP work has included:

- Examination and evaluation of the current Australian legally specified drug amounts for distinguishing use/possess from trafficking and recommendations to abolish 'deemed supply' provisions
- An evaluation of the impact of Portugal's decriminalisation of drugs
- Cannabis use/possess: comparing a legalised/regulated model with status quo
- Background briefing paper for the Australia21 Roundtable, July 2012. Hughes, C. and Wodak, A. (2012). "What can Australia learn from different approaches to drugs in Europe including especially Portugal, Switzerland, the Netherlands and Sweden?" Australia21, Canberra.
- Increasing the evidence-base on alternatives to the traditional criminal justice sanctions in Australia e.g. evaluation of the ACT AOD diversion system
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Online resource for decision-makers: Drug law reform annotated bibliography.

3. Understanding Australian drug policy

Any endeavour to inform and influence drug policy requires a comprehensive understanding of current policies, investment mix, trends in policy making and relevant history. DPMP work has included:

- Analysis of Australia government spending in response to illicit drugs (the drug budgets report), revealing that the lion's share of government spending is in law enforcement (66%)

- An assessment of illicit drug policy in Australia (1985 to 2010): themes and trends, which noted the shifting role of government and rise of the third sector (pluralised governance)
- Analysis of a conservative shift in Australian drug policy associated with the “Howard years”: conflicting results
- Review of policy coordination systems in Australian drug policy
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Online resource: The Australian (illicit) drug policy timeline: 1985-2013, Drug Policy Modelling Program. Last updated March 2013.

4. Improving drug law enforcement effectiveness

Drug law enforcement takes the lion’s share of Australian government resources in responding to illicit drugs (66%; DPMP research). The substantial investment in policing needs to be better matched to research evidence of effectiveness. DPMP has evaluated the effectiveness of drug law enforcement and conducted studies on novel methods to improve drug law enforcement. DPMP work has included:

- Examining the relative cost-effectiveness of different types of law enforcement interventions directed towards methamphetamine, where clan lab detections were more cost-effective than border control
- The application of social network analysis (SNA) to depict crime syndicates – how police agencies might use SNA as a drugs law enforcement strategy
- Reducing the methamphetamine problem in Australia: Evaluating innovative partnerships between police, pharmacies and other third parties
- A Campbell Collaboration systematic review that discovered the ineffectiveness of crop eradication programs relative to the effectiveness of crop substitution programs
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Police workshop: Using agent-based models to inform police practice: SimDrugPolicing: an interactive modelling exercise with police on a street-based heroin market.

5. Understanding changing trends in drug use and supply in Australia

Drug use and associated harms change over time. Good policy has to be informed by the most up-to-date epidemiological estimates of prevalence of drug use, changing patterns of use and harms. Good policy also demands attention to how best to track changes in supply (rather than simple policing activity) and to expose intersections between illicit drug supply and other criminal activity. DPMP work has included:

- The Melbourne Injecting Drug User Cohort Study
- Tracking cocaine trends in Australia: supply and use have increased but not amongst regular drug users
- New methods for examining supply changes within Australia: using multiple indicators rather than previously simplistic measures (# and weight of seizures)
- Trafficking in multiple commodities: Exposing Australia’s poly-drug and poly-crime networks
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Roxburgh et al. (2012). A comprehensive report on trends in drug use and related harms in Australia, 2001 to 2011.

6. Providing better drug treatment in Australia

Drug treatment (as DPMP research has shown) is cost-effective and produces good economic outcomes for governments. We have studied the extent of under-supply of drug treatment in Australia, challenges associated with the affordability and availability of treatment, and economic evaluation of treatment. DPMP work has included:

- Treatment pathways from the client’s perspective: informing a better match between service provision and service need

- Promoting compliance, ‘recovery’ and ‘desistance’: Comparative case studies of pre-sentence diversion schemes for drug misusing arrestees in Australia and England
- Optimal allocation of treatment for hepatitis C virus among injecting drug users in and out of methadone maintenance treatment
- The NSW Opioid Treatment Program: estimating unmet need and demand; exploring policy options and service configurations
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Expert witness at a NSW Parliamentary Inquiry into Drug and Alcohol Treatment. Sydney, NSW. (Ritter, April 2013).

7. Enhancing translation from research into policy

The effective translation and uptake of research evidence into policy processes requires an understanding of the nexus between research and policy. DPMP work has included:

- Analysis of where Australian policy makers go to source research evidence, revealing that the top source was the internet (‘Google’), and academic papers were much lower down on the list
- Review of existing theoretical models of policy making to inform the use of evidence
- Measuring research influence on drug policy: a case example of two epidemiological monitoring systems, showing the multiple means of research influence (eg. parliamentary inquiries, media, citations of technical reports) and how they can be documented
- Case study: The evolution of a largely drug law enforcement response to the Australian “ice epidemic”: how the way the problem comes to be defined matches the solutions.
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Ritter, A. (2007, November). Where do policy makers go to find research evidence? Paper presentation at the Combined APSAD and Cutting Edge Addiction Conference, Auckland, New Zealand.

8. Studying policy processes: politics, media and public opinion

Policy is more than the simple application of research evidence. Politics, media and public opinion play important roles in influencing policy decision-making. DPMP has systematically collected data on trends in public opinion in Australia, and conducted research on the role media plays.

DPMP work has included:

- Trends in Australian public opinion about illicit drugs and illicit drugs policy, revealing largely stable opinions over a ten year period (2001 to 2010)
- Young people’s ideas about how governments and community can best respond to alcohol and other drug issues
- Public opinion and drug policy: engaging the ‘affected community’ (people who consume drugs), examining differences in opinions between people who use drugs and general population views
- Media reporting of illicit drug use in Australia: trends and impacts on youth attitudes to illicit drugs revealing that media does not incite drug use
- Submissions, presentations, publications, resources, for example: Lancaster, K. (2010, November). Stop the Press! Reporting the trends & dominant portrayals of illicit drugs in the Australian media, 2003 – 2008. APSAD, Canberra.

The future

Drugs and alcohol remain critical issues for Australia. Young people are experiencing greater levels of alcohol-related harm. The emergence of new psychoactive substances (so called legal highs) purchased over the internet is currently an intractable policy problem. Internationally, we are in a time of great change in relation to legal status of drugs like cannabis⁹. Substantial unmet need for alcohol and drug treatment exists. DPMP is addressing these important areas: conducting new research and engaging in translational activities that will ensure our findings are taken up and inform better policy responses.

The future for DPMP is good. As a result of the CFT funding, we have built a permanent drug policy research capacity in Australia, and will sustain a critical mass of scholars. Our track record at attracting competitive research funds is outstanding, and will provide future funds for research activity¹⁰. Our established reputation for providing independent, non-partisan and rigorous research means that we will continue to be successful with government-commissioned research.

The Colonial Foundation Trust has given us the opportunity to build an internationally recognised drug policy program, conduct cutting-edge research and most importantly, work at the interface of research and policy such that we can make a difference in the lives of people who use alcohol and other drugs, those around them, and society at large. We are extremely grateful.

⁹ Colorado and Washington in the USA; Uruguay and other South American nations are all moving/have moved towards legalised/regulated models of supply. This presents important opportunities for research and for traction in Australia on these issues.

¹⁰ We do, however, face a future challenge in funding sources for dissemination and translational activities. This includes the DPMP symposia and workshops, roundtables with decision-makers, our website, other capacity building activities (such as our annual grant writing workshop), and administrative support. Funding for these activities is not provided within research grants.
